OPTIONAL SOURCE DEPTH

European companies were chartered bodies seeking monopoly profits in Asian trade, especially spices, textiles and later revenue-rich territories.

The Portuguese pioneered naval coercion through forts, fleets, the cartaz system and the Estado da India .

The Dutch VOC was commercially formidable but prioritised the Indonesian archipelago the Amboyna Massacre (1623) worsened English-Dutch rivalry and pushed English attention elsewhere.

ADVANCED DEBATE

The English Company gradually built a network of coastal bases: Surat , Madras , Bombay and Calcutta .

The French Company under Colbert developed Pondicherry and Chandernagore , but French state dependence and weaker naval-financial support limited it.

Dupleix showed that European companies could intervene in Indian succession disputes and convert military support into political influence.

The English learned the same techniques but combined them with stronger naval links, private capital, more stable company organisation and later Bengal revenues.

LEGACY / NUANCE

Wandiwash (1760) was decisive because it destroyed French field power in south India Treaty of Paris (1763) restored factories but not French political ambition.

CAUTION: This phase marks the shift from a trading corporation to a company-state , where commerce, diplomacy, fortification and army-building merged.
