OPTIONAL SOURCE DEPTH
- Early Orientalist policy supported institutions like Calcutta Madrasa and Sanskrit College .
- reflecting an attempt to govern through classical learning and traditional elites.
- The Anglicist victory after Macaulay's Minute and Bentinck's 1835 resolution shifted state support toward English education and Western knowledge.
- The downward filtration theory assumed that educating a small English-educated elite would spread knowledge to the wider population.

ADVANCED DEBATE
- Wood's Despatch, 1854 broadened the framework by recommending a department of public
- instruction in each province, grants-in-aid, teacher training, vernacular primary education and universities.
- CAUTION: English education served colonial administrative needs, but it also produced the - intelligentsia that criticised colonial rule using liberal, rationalist and nationalist arguments.

LEGACY / NUANCE
- The Indian press began with Hicky's Bengal Gazette (1780) and expanded into English and vernacular spaces of debate.
- Metcalfe's 1835 press policy earned him the title "liberator of the press", but later crises produced restrictions such as the Licensing Act of 1857.
- Vernacular Press Act, 1878 under Lytton targeted Indian-language newspapers; Amrita Bazar Patrika famously shifted to English to escape its scope.
- Reform legislation included abolition of Sati (1829) , suppression of female infanticide and thugee.

OPTIONAL STATUS — This optional depth is unnecessary for a competent core answer; use it only for added nuance after the complete core has been written.
