STATIC THEORY

- Linguistic reorganisation, feared in 1948 as a solvent of national unity, has in practice strengthened it by aligning administrative units with lived identities — provided "one language, one state" was rejected, as Fazl Ali insisted.

- The line between Article 3 and Article 368 is the line between internal readjustment and loss of sovereignty: Parliament may diminish a state's area by ordinary law, but it may cede territory to a foreign country only by constitutional amendment.

- The distinction between the "territory of India" and the "Union of India" is not pedantic: it is what lets Union Territories and acquired territories belong to India without being full members of its federation.
